

Links:

- Budget Bytes: <https://www.budgetbytes.com/>
- America's Test Kitchen: <https://www.americastestkitchen.com/>

Most recipe websites I viewed shared certain characteristics, such as a main/hero display showing a featured or latest recipe, a navigation bar to access different views on the website, and icons/cards displaying different recipe collections or recipes themselves. As my project currently does not really have enough recipes to make numerous sections based on things like meal type or featured ingredient practical, I have simply displayed a list of recipes on the home page, in addition to including a nav bar and call to action button that the user can use to access the recipe list page. In the future, more elements could be added to the nav bar, such as one for a feature that would allow users to view certain recipe collections, or other things of that nature that are common on recipe websites. Additionally, the recipe card display could be replaced with recipes from featured collections or things of that nature to inspire users on the home page.